MAT 6:28

¹ In MAT 6:28 the Sinaiticus manuscript has an interesting reading, οὐ ξένουσιν (= οὐ ξαίνουσιν), thus providing three processes or activities involving cloth rather than two. However, in view of the relatively limited support for this reading, most translators follow the text which has αὐξάνουσιν they grow.

ξύλον

ξύλον (G3586)

noun, n. | -ον | ξύλινος

3.60 · Plants · Wood and Wood Products

wood wood as a substance A number of languages make a clear distinction between wood as a substance used in artifacts and constructions and wood used for heating or cooking. A further distinction may be made between durable wood (not readily subject to rot or to the effects of termites and borers) and less durable and therefore relatively unsatisfactory wood.

1CO 3:12 · REV 18:12 · REV 18:12

3.61 · Plants · Wood and Wood Products

firewood wood as a substance used to burn for heat ξύλον in LUK 23:31 may also be interpreted as a live green tree (see 3.4). If one assumes that the meaning here is ‘firewood,’ then it may be necessary to translate ‘wood which has not had an opportunity to dry out’ or ‘wood which is still green’ or ‘... which is still wet with sap.’

LUK 23:31

3.4 · Plants · Trees

tree large perennial plant, usually having a woody central stem, called a trunk, with secondary branches growing from it It is also possible to understand ξύλον in LUK 23:31 as ‘firewood.’ One may therefore translate the first part of this conditional sentence as ‘if they do these things to firewood which has recently been cut’ or ‘if they do these things to firewood which hasn’t dried out’ (see 3.61).

In REV 2:7 and REV 22:2 ξύλον τῆς ζωῆς ‘tree of life’ may cause certain complications if the passage is translated more or less literally ‘I will give him to eat of the tree of life.’ In some languages a literal rendering would mean ‘to gnaw on the tree of life,’ that is to say, to eat the wood or the bark. It may therefore be necessary to translate ‘to eat the fruit of the tree of life’ or ‘... the fruit from the tree that causes life’ or ‘... causes people to live.’
