needle a small, slender instrument, pointed on one end and with a hole at the other end, used in passing thread through cloth in sewing There is no convincing evidence that the expression ‘eye of a needle’ in MAT 19:24 and LUK 18:25 is a figurative name for a narrow gate. The reference to a camel passing through the eye of a needle is a case of rhetorical hyperbole, that is to say, a purposeful exaggeration to point out the extreme difficulty of the event referred to.

ῥέω

ῥέω (G4482)

verb | fut. ῥεύσω | αἰμορροέω · Παραρρέω · ῥύσις · χεῖμαρρος

14.17 · Physical Events and States · Events Involving Liquids and Dry Masses

to flow, a flow the movement of a liquid in some direction¹ In a number of languages a term referring to the flow of liquid may also be applied to the movement of any object, so that a literal rendering might be ‘the liquid moved.’ However, terms for ‘flow’ or ‘pour’ often differ substantially on the basis of the direction of the flow. For example, if the flow is relatively horizontal, and therefore slow, it may have one term, while if it is quite fast, another expression may be used, and if the flow is almost perpendicular (as in the case of pouring), a still different term is employed.

JHN 7:38

to begin to shout, to shout to suddenly break out into shouting In GAL 4:27 the combination ῥήξον καὶ βόησον may be analyzed either as two expressions for shouting, for example, ‘break into shouting and shout,’ or ῥήξον may function primarily as an aspectual qualifier of βόησον, so that the meaning of the expression ῥήξον καὶ βόησον may be ‘break into shouting’ or ‘begin to shout,’ but the beginning of shouting would imply considerable energy, spontaneity, and suddenness. ῥυπαρός (G4508)

adjc. | -ά, -όν | ῥυπαίνομαι

79.52 · Features of Objects · Clean, Dirty dirty, filthy pertaining to being dirty or filthy In JAS 2:2 the emphasis of ῥυπαρός is not upon clothes being ragged as one might expect in the case of a poor man, but upon the clothes being filthy and thus the basis for greater offense and avoidance.

88.257 · Moral and Ethical Qualities and Related Behavior · Impurity morally impure, morally filthy, morally perverted pertaining to being morally impure or filthy It would be a mistake to assume that physical filth is necessarily related to moral impurity. Hence, one cannot simply take a word meaning 'dirty' and presume that it may carry the figurative significance of moral depravity or impurity. The equivalent in some languages is 'moral degenerate,' 'stained with badness,' 'spotted with evil,' or 'has sin on him like leprous spots.'

noun, f. | -εως | ῥέω

to flow, a flow the movement of a liquid in some direction¹ In a number of languages a term referring to the flow of liquid may also be applied to the movement of any object, so that a literal rendering might be ‘the liquid moved.’ However, terms for ‘flow’ or ‘pour’ often differ substantially on the basis of the direction of the flow. For example, if the flow is relatively horizontal, and therefore slow, it may have one term, while if it is quite fast, another expression may be used, and if the flow is almost perpendicular (as in the case of pouring), a still different term is employed.

ῥώννυμι (G4517) — ῥώννυμαι

verb

23.133 · (ῥώννυμαι[a]) · Physiological Processes and States · Health, Vigor, Strength to fare well (derivative of a base meaning literally ‘to be strong,’ ‘to be well,’ but used in the NT only as a formula for the ending of letters) to be well and to fare well! The occurrence of ῥώννυμαι as an epistolary formula may be understood in two different senses: either as a sincere expression of the wish that the person involved may fare well or merely as a device to indicate that the letter is complete. This second sense of ῥώννυμαι is treated in 33.24.

ACT 15:29

33.24 · (ῥώννυμαι[b]) · Communication · Discourse Types goodbye to end a letter by means of the expression ἔρρωσθε (ἔρρωσσω in some manuscripts), always having a favorable connotation. Since in ACT 15:29 ἔρρωσθε ends a letter, it may be necessary in some languages to employ a typical letter-ending formula which will at the same time be favorable, for example, ‘with best wishes’ or ‘with sincere greetings.’ It would be quite wrong to use literally an expression such as ‘goodbye’ if this would be employed only or principally in direct address rather than at the end of a letter. For another interpretation of ἔρρωσθε in ACT 15:29, see 23.133.

¹ The analysis of ῥώννυμαι in its epistolary usage is similar to the use of the term dear in English, used at the beginning of a letter. It may actually represent an affectionate greeting, but it is more likely to occur simply as a greeting formula.
