θάλασσα

θάλασσα (G2281)

noun, f. | -ης | ἀλίζω

1.69 · Geographical Objects and Features · Bodies of Water

the sea a generic collective term for all bodies of water (in this sense θάλασσα[a] is contrasted with the sky and the land) This generic sense of θάλασσα[a] may be expressed in some languages as ‘extensions of water’ or simply as ‘water.’ In other instances it may be necessary to employ a phrase such as ‘lakes and oceans,’ while in certain languages a term for ocean also has a generic sense of any extensive area of water.

1.70 · Geographical Objects and Features · Bodies of Water

sea, lake a particular body of water, normally rather large The use of θάλασσα[b] to refer to a lake such as the Lake of Galilee (MAT 4:18; MRK 1:16) or the Lake of Tiberias (JHN 21:1) reflects Semitic usage, in which all bodies of water from oceans to pools could be referred to by a single term. Normal Greek usage would employ λίμνη lake, pool (1.72).

Many languages make a clear distinction between different types of bodies of water. The three principal bases for differentiation are (1) fresh, brackish, or salty, (2) relative size, that is, large versus small bodies of water, and (3) existence of an outlet. On the basis of this third type of distinction, a term to designate the Sea of Galilee would need to be different from that used in speaking of the Dead Sea, since the Sea of Galilee has an outlet while the Dead Sea does not. Considerable care must be exercised in the choice of terms for such bodies of water, since failure to select the right terms may result in serious distortion of geography and therefore considerable misunderstanding of the geographical setting of biblical events.

23.99 · Physiological Processes and States · Live, Die to die, death the process of dying In a number of languages clear distinctions are made in the use of terms for dying on the basis of the manner or circumstances of death. For example, one term may refer to death primarily as the result of old age, while another term may refer to death caused by sickness, and still other terms may be used for death caused by violence. Careful distinctions must be used in determining the choice of terms based on particular contexts.

to stop completely, to cease completely (a figurative extension of meaning of θανατόω[a] 'to put to death,' 20.65) to cease completely from activity, with the implication of extreme measures taken to guarantee such a cessation¹ It is possible that in rendering this expression in ROM 8:13 one may desire to retain the figure of speech and therefore translate 'if by the Spirit you put to death the works of the body.'

ROM 7:4 · ROM 8:13

to desire, to want, to wish to desire to have or experience something As may be noted, in translating θέλησις, θέλημα[a] (25.2), βούλημα[a] (25.4), and εὐδοκία[b] (25.8), there is a tendency to employ verbs rather than nouns. This is true especially in languages outside the Indo-European family of languages. Wanting, desiring, and wishing are essentially psychological events or states and accordingly are most frequently expressed in languages by verbs.

verb | impf. ἤθελον | ἐθελοθρησκία · θέλημα · θέλησις

30.58 · Think · To Intend, To Purpose, To Plan to purpose to purpose, generally based upon a preference and desire It is also possible that θέλω in COL 1:27 focuses more upon 'desire' (see 25.1).

to be of an opinion, to think something is so to have a particular view or opinion about something Since θέλω in 2PE 3:5 is the only NT occurrence with this meaning, a number of scholars prefer to interpret θέλω in this context as referring to intention or evident purpose, in which case the meaning would be related to θέλω[a] (30.58).

25.1 · Attitudes and Emotions · Desire, Want, Wish to desire, to want, to wish to desire to have or experience something As may be noted, in translating θέλησις[a] (25.2), βούλημα[a] (25.4), and εὐδοκία[b] (25.8), there is a tendency to employ verbs rather than nouns. This is true especially in languages outside the Indo-European family of languages. Wanting, desiring, and wishing are essentially psychological events or states and accordingly are most frequently expressed in languages by verbs.

θεμέλιος

θεμέλιος

θεμέλιος (G2310) — θεμέλιον

noun, m. | -ου | τίθημι

7.41 · Constructions · Parts and Areas of Buildings foundation that on which a structure is built¹ In some languages it is possible to describe a typical foundation in ancient times as ‘large stones underneath the walls.’ In other languages, however, this may seem to be quite a meaningless type of expression, since foundations are only made secure by driving stakes deep into the ground. Therefore, it may be best to describe the function of a foundation by ‘what keeps the walls firm’ or ‘how the walls are made not to move’ or ‘what goes beneath the walls.’

Θεοδίδακτος

θεοδίδακτος

θεοδίδακτος (G2312)

adjc. | -ον | θεός + διδάσκω

33.228 · Communication · Teach taught by God, instructed by God pertaining to being taught by God In a number of languages the passive expression θεοδιδάκτοί ἐστε in 1TH 4:9 must be rendered in an active form, for example, ‘for God himself has taught you how you should love one another.’

adjc. | -ον | θεός + μάχομαι

39.32 · Hostility, Strife · Strife, Struggle to fight against God, to be against God, to be an enemy of God pertaining to fighting against God Although the figurative expression ‘fighting against God’ is an unusual and radical figure of speech, it can often be translated more or less literally, but in some languages such an expression is regarded as both impossible and even ludicrous, and therefore one must employ some such expression as ‘to be a constant enemy of God’ or ‘to be always against God.’

adjc. | -ον | θεός + πνέω

33.261 · Communication · Preach, Proclaim inspired by God, divinely inspired pertaining to a communication which has been inspired by God In a number of languages it is difficult to find an appropriate term to render ‘inspired.’ In some instances ‘Scripture inspired by God’ is rendered as ‘Scripture, the writer of which was influenced by God’ or ‘... guided by God.’ It is important, however, to avoid an expression which will mean only ‘dictated by God.’

θεός (G2316) — θεά

noun, m. | -οῦ | ἄθεος · θεά · θεῖος · θεϊότης · θεοδίδακτος · θεομάχος · θεόπνευστος · θεοσέβεια · θεοσεβής · θεοστυγής · θεότης · φιλόθεος

12.1 · Supernatural Beings and Powers · Supernatural Beings

God the one supreme supernatural being as creator and sustainer of the universe. The componential features of θεός involve a basic, underlying ambivalence. On the one hand, θεός is regarded as unique to the exclusion of all other gods: οὐδείς θεός εἰ μὴ εἷς ‘there is no God but one’ 1CO 8:4. This is strictly a monotheistic view of θεός. On the other hand, there occur such expressions as εἴπερ εἰσὶν λεγόμενοι θεοί ‘even if there are so-called gods’ (1CO 8:5), and in the OT the Lord is described as being ‘far above all gods’ (PSA 97:9), ‘the God of gods’ (PSA 136:2), and the ‘great King above all gods’ (PSA 95:3), which is essentially a henotheistic view of θεός. Fundamentally, however, the NT view may be most succinctly reflected in GAL 4:8, τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσιν θεοῖς ‘those who by nature are not really gods.’ In other words, the gods of the pagans (see 12.22) are not to be viewed in the same category as θεός[a].

A further semantic problem is involved in the use of θεός[a] in reference to Christ. In JHN 1:1, the ‘the Word was God,’ the meaning of θεός may be described on the basis that all the componential features of θεός[a] are applied to the referent λόγος, which is in turn identified with ‘Christ.’ This is not to be interpreted as indicating that the two referents are identical (which was, of course, the position of those who maintained the so-called patropassian heresy), but that the distinctive features of θεός[a] are also fully applicable to another referent, namely, the λόγος or Christ; that is to say, it is legitimate to interpret JHN 1:1 as ‘the Word was God’ but not as ‘God was the Word.’

Translational equivalents of ‘God’ are of three major types: (1) proper names, (2) descriptive titles, and (3) borrowed terms. There are a number of problems involved in each of these types of translational equivalents. If translators wish to employ in the biblical text a proper name in the receptor language, it is essential that the characteristics of the referent of such a name be sufficiently close to those which characterize the biblical God, so that the message may not be unduly distorted. In fact, the equivalent should be sufficiently close that ready identification can be made. The essential features of such a receptor language term should include (1) benevolent disposition and behavior, (2) creative and sustaining activity in the world, and (3) supreme power. In most instances it has not been found necessary for such a term to refer to a strictly monotheistic view (that is to say, having an existence which precludes the existence of any other gods), but it is essential that the name apply to a referent who is regarded as supreme over all others.

There may, however, be a number of difficulties involved in the use of an indigenous expression for θεός[a], since the views concerning such a god may involve such factors as (1) psychological distance (the idea that such a god, though all powerful, is still very remote from mankind) and (2) the necessity for constant propitiation (as though such a god needs to be constantly entreated or sustained by means of gifts in order to make him favorably disposed toward mankind).

In some instances problems have arisen in the use of an indigenous term for God because such a name may be perfectly appropriate in one area in which a language is spoken, but have quite a different meaning or value in another part of the language area. For example, in one area of East Africa the name for ‘God’ in one tribe is the name for the devil in a nearby, closely related tribe.

Descriptive titles for God (which often become essentially names) may focus upon a number of different features or characteristics. In some instances such descriptive titles are traditional for certain receptor languages. In other instances they have been constructed by translators on the basis of indigenous models. The following are illustrative examples of various types of descriptive titles: ‘he who made us,’ ‘the supreme powerful one,’ ‘the one who performs miracles,’ ‘the owner of all,’ ‘he who is sufficient,’ ‘our great father,’ ‘the highest one,’ ‘the great spirit,’ ‘the unending spirit,’ ‘the commanding spirit,’ ‘the great chief,’ ‘the self-existing one,’ and ‘the truly sacred one.’

Some Bible translators have attempted to avoid semantic complications by borrowing a term from a dominant language. In Latin America, for example, many early missionaries borrowed the Spanish term Dios, but in explaining the meaning of Dios as the great and all-powerful creator, they simply provided another name for what people already understood to be the sun. The difficulty with borrowed proper names is that they are essentially zero in meaning, that is to say, they are words with a significant absence of meaning which must be filled in one way or another, and this is usually done merely by equating the meaning of such a zero term with already existing concepts. Hence, rather than avoiding wrong views of God, borrowed terms often perpetuate wrong views indirectly.

There may also be additional complications in the use of a borrowed term, since it may not provide a basis for certain syntactic or morphological modifications. For example, some missionaries have borrowed the term Allah for ‘God,’ but in speaking of ‘gods’ they have attempted to add a plural to the underlying form Allah. In most instances this procedure has resulted in something which is not only conceptually and grammatically impossible, but also highly offensive to receptors.

One special problem involving θεός[a] results from the occurrence of ‘God’ in expressions of possession, for example, ‘my God’ or ‘our God.’ In a number of languages one simply cannot say ‘my God,’ for one cannot ‘possess God.’ Rather, one must say ‘the God whom I worship’ or ‘the God in whom I trust.’ Similarly, it may be impossible to speak of ‘the God of Abraham’ without implying that such a God would only be an idol, that is to say, ‘the God that Abraham personally possessed.’ Under such circumstances it may be necessary to translate ‘the God of Abraham’ as ‘the God in whom Abraham trusted.’

Ideally, one should employ a well known receptor-language term for ‘God’ which would be applicable not only to the one supreme being, but could also refer to the ‘gods of the heathen,’ that is to say, a rendering of θεός[a] should be a generic expression which could be made particular and even exclusive by some such qualifier as ‘the’ or ‘the one’ or ‘the unique.’ Sometimes this can only be done by a qualifier such as ‘the great’ or even ‘the supreme.’

god any one of many different supernatural beings regarded as having authority or control over some aspect of the universe or human activity Some translators have made a practice of trying to render the meaning of θεός[b] by terms which mean essentially demons or evil spirits, but this is a mistake, for though the gods of the ancient pagans may be regarded as having had no existence at all, nevertheless, the NT does not speak of them as being evil.

In those languages in which there is no contrast between ‘gods’ and ‘spirits,’ that is to say, in instances in which people believe only in indwelling spirits rather than in supernatural beings who have control over natural phenomena, it may be possible to distinguish ‘gods’ by speaking of them as ‘powerful spirits.’ In certain instances, therefore, the equivalent of ‘God’ (12.1) is ‘the all-powerful Spirit.’

Collocation: υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ

Son of God (a title applied to Jesus, literally: son of God, parallel in semantic structure to phrases consisting of υἱός followed by the genitive of class or kind; compare 9.4) one who has the essential characteristics and nature of God Before adopting a translation of υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ such as ‘Son of God,’ one must always investigate the extent to which such an expression might already be used in a particular language. For example, in the Tarahumara language of Mexico mankind is divided into two classes: (1) ‘sons of God,’ who are Tarahumaras and (2) ‘sons of the devil,’ all other people. In these circumstances it is necessary in translating υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ to use an expression which will identify ‘the unique Son of God’ or ‘the one who is truly the Son of God.’

adjc. | -ές | θεός + σέβομαι

53.6 · Religious Activities · Religious Practice

devout, pious, religious pertaining to being devoted to a proper expression of religious beliefs¹ In a number of languages the concept of ‘living a godly life’ may be best expressed as ‘to live as God would have one live’ or ‘to live like one should who believes in God’ or ‘to always do what God requires.’ In some languages, however, the only equivalent is ‘to live a good life’ or ‘to live always doing good to others.’ The shift from the focus upon religious belief to good living or being good to others results from the fact that in some religious systems there is little or no connection between religious beliefs and moral behavior.

67.163 · Time · Definite Units of Time: Year, Month, Week, Day, Hour

summer the warmest period of the year and primarily the season for the growth of vegetation In some areas of the Tropics, there are difficulties involved in arriving at a satisfactory term for θέρος. It may not be possible, for example, to use ‘the warm season,’ since that may refer to the end of a dry season just before the rains begin. Normally, therefore, one can equate θέρος with ‘the rainy season,’ but a context such as LUK 21:30 may be difficult, for one would not normally say ‘when you see that the trees are putting out leaves, you know that the rainy season is near,’ for trees normally do not put out the leaves until after the rainy season has begun. It may, therefore, be necessary to render LUK 21:30 as ‘when you see the trees putting out leaves, you know that the time for growth is near’ or ‘... the time for trees to produce fruit.’

to trap, to catch off guard, to catch in a mistake (figurative extension of meaning of term meaning literally ‘to hunt,’ ‘to trap,’ not occurring in the NT) to acquire information about an error or fault, with the purpose of causing harm or trouble In a number of languages it is possible to retain the figurative meaning of ‘trap’ or ‘catch,’ but in a number of instances other figures are used, for example, ‘to cause to trip,’ ‘to cause to fall,’ ‘to hear wrong words from his mouth,’ or ‘to use his words against him.’

to be in a serious struggle with, to have to contend with (a figurative extension of meaning of θηριομαχέω ‘to be forced to fight with wild animals,’ not occurring in the NT) to be in conflict with forceful opposition Some persons have assumed that θηριομαχέω in 1CO 15:32 is to be understood in a literal sense, but this is very unlikely. One can, however, preserve something of the figurative force of this expression by rendering this question in 1CO 15:32 as “if I have, as it were, fought ‘wild beasts’ here in Ephesus simply from human motives, what have I gained?” (TEV). By making a metaphor into a simile one can preserve something of the figurative value of the phrase, while at the same time not introducing possible misunderstanding.

4.4 · Animals · Animals

animal, quadruped any four-footed animal, either wild or domesticated A high percentage of languages appear to have no generic term to identify all kinds of quadrupeds whether wild or domesticated. Rather, they tend to make quite clear distinctions between wild and domesticated animals, and therefore it may be necessary to indicate both types in those contexts where the reference is to both wild as well as domesticated animals. For example, one may sometimes speak of ‘animals of the grass and animals of the forest’ or ‘animals of the barn and animals of the mountains.’

In ACT 10:12 the reference is primarily to wild animals, since for the most part wild animals would be those designated as unclean. However, swine were also regarded as unclean, and they were domesticated.

In REV 13:1ff two visionary creatures are referred to by the term θηρίον ‘beast.’ Despite their strange symbolic appearance, they would no doubt be included within the potential range of reference of θηρίον[b] .

bad person, wicked person, evil beast (a figurative extension of meaning of θηρίον[b] ‘(wild) animal,’ 4.4) a bad person, in the sense of being both harmful and dangerous The translation of θηρίον[c] as merely ‘wild animal’ may be seriously misunderstood in some languages, since speaking of a person as ‘a wild animal’ might be a compliment based upon the idea of strength and courage. It may, therefore, be necessary to use some such expression as ‘dangerous animal’ or ‘harmful wild animal.’

TIT 1:12

¹ ACT 28:4 · HEB 12:20 · JAS 3:7 θηρίον[a] (4.3) in ACT 28:4 includes reptiles and is thus more highly generic in meaning than θηρίον[b] (4.4) which in JAS 3:7 involves a contrast between (1) quadrupeds and (2) birds, reptiles, and fish. In a number of contexts it is quite impossible to determine whether θηρίον[a] or θηρίον[b] refers to wild or to domesticated animals. For example, in HEB 12:20 the reference would seem to be to domesticated animals that might wander over to the holy mountain, but in JAS 3:7 the context points clearly to wild animals, since the reference is to the taming of such animals. But whether the reference is to wild or domesticated animals depends primarily upon the context, and there seems to be no way in which one can clearly distinguish two different meanings of θηρίον, based on wild versus domesticated distinctions.

θύελλα

θύελλα

θύελλα (G2366)

noun, f. | -ης | θύω + ἄελλα

14.6 · Physical Events and States · Wind windstorm, whirlwind, squall sudden and violent gusts of winds, often from varied directions¹ In a number of languages a strong wind which causes the waves or a storm on water must be referred to by a special term. Compare, for example, the English term squall; this would mean a wind of relatively short duration but sufficiently intense so as to create relatively high waves.

HEB 12:18

¹ It may very well be that θύελλα and λαῖλαψ differ somewhat with respect to the suddenness of wind or the force of the wind. In certain contexts outside of the NT, λαῖλαψ would appear to be a somewhat stronger wind than θύελλα, but this is by no means certain, and for the NT there is no way to determine whether such a distinction is relevant.

θύϊνος

θύϊνος (G2367)

adjc. | -η, -ον | θύω [θυίω (smell good)] · θυία (odorous cedar; perhaps)

3.63 · Plants · Wood and Wood Products of citron wood pertaining to being made or consisting of citron wood (that is, from a citron tree, a coniferous tree related to cypresses, pines, and cedars; up to 9 m high; scaly leaves, reddish brown bark, sweet-smelling wood) The citron tree belongs to the citrus family of plants, and it produces a pale yellow fruit somewhat larger than a lemon, the rind of which is often candied. In REV 18:12, however, the focus is upon the fine quality of the wood, and since citron trees are not known in many parts of the world, it may be useful to translate πᾶν ξύλον θύϊνον simply as ‘all kinds of valuable wood.’

θυμός (G2372)

noun, m. | -οῦ | θυμόομαι

88.178 · Moral and Ethical Qualities and Related Behavior · Anger, Be Indignant With anger, fury, wrath, rage a state of intense anger, with the implication of passionate outbursts In a number of contexts θυμός[a] is combined with ὀργή[a] (88.173) in such a manner that the meaning of one simply heightens the intensity or significance of the other, as in ROM 2:8, τοῖς δὲ ἐξ ἐριθείας καὶ ἀπειθοῦσι τῇ ἀληθείᾳ πειθομένοις δὲ τῇ ἀδικίᾳ ὀργὴ καὶ θυμός ‘and to those who out of jealousy reject the truth and adhere to evil, there will be fury and anger.’ But in a number of languages it is necessary to specify who experiences such anger or fury, and therefore it may be necessary to translate ‘God will be furious and angry against them.’ The fury and anger of God is generally interpreted in terms of ‘divine retribution and punishment.’

entrance, entranceway, portal the entranceway into a building or structure In JHN 10:9 θύρα[b] is used figuratively to refer to Jesus as the means of access to salvation: ἐγώ εἰμι ἡ θύρα δι’ ἐμοῦ ἐάν τις εἰσέλθῃ σωθήσεται ‘I am the door; whoever comes in by me will be saved.’ In JHN 10:9 the emphasis is upon the door as a passageway and not as an object closing off an entrance. Literal translations of ‘I am the door’ may often lead to misinterpretation, since the term used for ‘door’ is likely to refer to a literal door rather than to the entranceway, thus suggesting that Jesus Christ functions primarily to prevent passage rather than making entrance possible.
